Sections of several types of human inflammatory lesions were examined by immunohistochemistry to determine whether the levels of one or both of the eicosanoids PGE2 and PGD2 are altered during the inflammatory process. It was demonstrated that the levels of PGE2 and PGD2 increase in parallel in the early stages of inflammation. The morphology of the lesions has an influence on the distribution and levels of both of the prostanoids.Confocal microscopy of stomatal guard cell F-actin in Arabidopsis thaliana: a rapid approach to guard cell morphological analysis. F-actin was labeled in the stomatal guard cells of Arabidopsis thaliana leaves by means of an antibody against the abundant actin protein, followed by confocal laser scanning microscopy and image analysis. The fixation of cells and their subsequent treatment with antibodies proved to be important for the high quality of the stomatal images. To enable rapid analysis of a large number of cells, guard cells were detached from leaves with a micro-cutting device and mounted in a slide-chamber on a heated microscope stage that enabled continuous observation of the same cell over a period of several minutes. Under these conditions, the volume of the cell, the width of its wall, and the number of microfibrils were measured with a precision of about 10%. It was confirmed that
